

Dr Rachel Kesse-Adu is a consultant haematologist who qualified in medicine from Imperial College School of Medicine in 2002 and completed her specialist training in haematology at Kings College Hospital in London in 2012. She has specialist interest in haemoglobinopathies and medical education. Her particular areas of interest in haemoglobinopathies are cardiorespiratory, chronic pain and urological complications. She runs joint specialist clinics in these areas. She is involved in clinical research in sickle cell disease and is the Training program director for haematology in SE London.